Do you prefer to read a book or use a computer? Do you think that a book is too heavy to carry? Are you a person from the Internet era? Every day, these ideas go through my mind.

Many years ago, Marshall McLuhan who was a communication theoretician predicted that, in the future, humans will prefer computers to printed books. He defined computers as extensions of the human nervous system, and he thought that they will allow people to reach every part of the world, in only a few minutes or seconds. He was right, but he never saw the accomplishment of his prediction, because he died in 1980.

After thinking and re-thinking, I understood the real importance of the electronic era. However, I started to think about the new role of printed books. I am sure that, in the future, they will not disappear. Their new mission might be to rest on the shelves of our personal libraries or offices, waiting until someone looks at them and decides to enjoy reading.

A man had a very clever dog. That man lived in a small town and everybody knew his dog there. When his friends met his dog in the street, they often gave him a cent and the dog took it in his mouth, went to the shop and bought some food for himself. One day the dog met one of his master's friends in the street. That man decided to play a trick on the dog and gave him a bad cent. The dog took it and went to the shop. But when the shop assistant saw the cent, he gave the dog nothing for it. Then the dog took the cent in his mouth, left the shop and came to the man who was still standing near the shop window.
