MEALS

People usually have four meals a day. They are breakfast, lunch, dinner, and tea or supper. Most people never have supper because they don't want to eat much before going to bed. If they happen to feel hungry late in the evening, they have a cup of tea with a small slice of bread and butter and maybe some ham or sausage. The children, as a rule, have porridge and milk.

Usually, people have lunch at work. They cannot get home for this meal so they eat it in a cafe, or take food from home — such as sandwiches, biscuits — and have lunch at work.

Dinner is a substantial meal for most of the people. At home, they usually have a three-course dinner, especially on weekends. On Saturdays and Sundays all the family eats together, as a rule. For the first course, people have soup. Then they have some kind of meat with vegetables. For dessert, they often have a cup of coffee, or tea, and maybe some juice with cakes or sweets.

By the way, in England “tea” is not only a drink like coffee and juice, but it is a meal, too. “5 o'clock tea” is a meal when people have a cup of tea (often with cream) with sandwiches, cakes, and scones (a kind of cake with raisins).
